

TRAFFICKING IN WOMEN AND GIRLS: MEETING THE CHALLENGE TOGETHER
International Conference
New York, 5 March 2007

CHAIRS' SUMMARY

I. Introduction

1. 'Trafficking in Women and Girls: Meeting the Challenge Together' International Conference was organised at the United Nations Headquarters, ECOSOC Chamber, in New York on 5 March 2007 by the Permanent Missions of Belarus and the Philippines to the United Nations, UN Office on Drugs and Crime and the Vital Voices Global Partnership in partnership with UNICEF, UNFIP, IOM, Interpol, OSCE, INSTRAW, Girls Learn International™, Inc., the Committee on Children's Rights of the Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations in Consultative Relationship with the United Nations, the Working Group on Girls of the NGO Committee on UNICEF, the International Union of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences and other partners.
2. The conference was organised as a part of the thematic informal debate of the General Assembly on gender equality and empowerment of women and coincided with the 51st Session of the Commission on the Status of Women which in 2007 focused on discrimination and violence against the girl child.
3. The conference was attended by over 400 people representing Member States, UN agencies, international organisations, civil society and mass media, including heads of national ministries dealing with gender issues and social development, heads of major agencies of the UN system and other international organisations.
4. Special guests of the conference President of the General Assembly Her Excellency Sheikha Haya Rashed Al Khalifa, President of the Economic and Social Council His Excellency Dalius Čekuolis and the Deputy Secretary-General Dr. Asha-Rose Migiro opened the event.
5. Co-chairs of the conference were the Permanent Representatives of Belarus and the Philippines. Panel discussions were moderated by the Chief of the UNODC Anti-Trafficking Unit and the Chief of the UNODC New York Office.
6. The conference embodies the continuation of the process that emanates from the consensus in the General Assembly on two important resolutions. Resolution 61/144 'Trafficking in women and girls' stresses the important role of a strong gender approach in combating this crime. Resolution 61/180 'Improving coordination of efforts against trafficking in persons' underscores the need to foster a global partnership against trafficking in persons, invites Member States to consider the advisability of a United Nations strategy or plan of action on combating trafficking in persons, and establishes an inter-agency coordination group on trafficking in persons.

7. The conference focused on the ways of ensuring holistic and comprehensive response of the international community to the challenge of trafficking in women and girls, including through gender-sensitive anti-trafficking measures as an indispensable approach to rights-based anti-trafficking strategies.
8. The panelists at the conference were Ms. Rima Salah, Deputy Executive Director of UNICEF; H.E. Natalya Petkevich, Deputy Head of the Administration of the President of the Republic of Belarus; Ms. Kyung-wha Kang, Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights; Ms. Ndioro Ndiaye, Deputy Director General of the International Organisation for Migration; Ms. Alicia Bala, Under Secretary for Programs and Policy of the Department of Social Welfare and Development of the Philippines, Ms. Kristina Kangaspunta, Chief of Anti-Trafficking Unit of UNODC; Ms. Somaly Mam, Vital Voices Global Leadership, Ms. Carol Smolenski, “ECPAT-USA”; H.E. Mr. Vladimir Naumov, Minister of Interior of Belarus; Ms. Kristin Kvigne, Interpol; Ms. Michelle Clark, OSCE; H.E. Sir Emyr Jones Parry, Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the UN; Ms. Yvonne Rafferty, Professor of Pace University and Ms. Wenchi Yu Perkins, Vital Voices Global Partnership (in order of presentations).
9. Two documentary films were shown at the conference by Belarus and the Vital Voices. The films highlighted anti-trafficking activities and programs implemented in Belarus and Cambodia to fight trafficking in women and girls. They demonstrated the importance of a unified and effective response by the governments, in partnership with NGOs and civil society, in tackling the problem of trafficking in human beings. They also stressed the importance of individual initiative and example in raising public awareness of this crime and rallying public support to fight human trafficking.

II. Key findings

The conference identified a number of concerns and key findings.

Understanding the threats posed by trafficking in persons:

10. Participants noted that the problem of trafficking in persons, especially women and girls, knows no boundaries and affects both developed and developing countries. They said it creates a threat to national security, undermines economy and stability of society, and violates basic human rights and freedoms.
11. Participants also noted that trafficking in persons, especially women and girls, is the third most profitable criminal activity globally, after arms smuggling and drug trafficking, and that it affects 30 million women and girls and brings a profit of about 9.5 billion dollars for the traffickers/criminal syndicates. They suggested that this disgraceful phenomenon continues to exist in a civilised world because of ploys and tricks of traffickers, on the one hand, and the insufficient efforts of the international community in fighting it, on the other.

12. The conference recognised that two centuries after the abolition of the transatlantic slavery the number of contemporary slaves – victims of human trafficking – continues to grow from year to year. Modern day slavery has not become more humane; on the contrary, it became more devious and brutal. Participants suggested that the means that were used two hundred years ago against slavery can be used today against human trafficking. They pointed out that the slave trade was abolished through the elimination of demand and prohibition of the slave trade in destination countries – in Europe and North America. It was proposed that nowadays to achieve the abolition of human trafficking the international community should also focus on the elimination of demand for trafficked humans.
13. The conference emphasised that anti-trafficking methods need to be gender-sensitive. Increasing feminisation of migration, on the one hand, indicates the empowerment and larger autonomy of women but, on the other hand, it increases the vulnerability of women to human trafficking. Participants noted that women constitute 80 per cent of all victims of human trafficking.
14. Participants agreed that child trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation places children in harmful situations which also violate their human rights. They are subjected to life threatening situations, including extreme violence, physical and sexual abuse. Victims suffer from anxiety, depression and low self-esteem. They are prone to anti-social behavior, alcohol abuse and suicidal tendencies.
15. The importance of programmes to build protective environment for children, provide them with education, protect children from violence, exploitation and discrimination, including through the inclusion of courses on human trafficking in school programmes, was highlighted at the conference.
16. The conference recognised that girls happen to be the most vulnerable to human trafficking. Participants stressed the following factors that determine high vulnerability of girls to human trafficking: social and economic exclusion, violence, gender bias and other forms of discrimination, undervaluing of female labour, growing reliance of homework on girls, erosion of social norms, reform of traditional societies, attitudes towards girls as a source of pleasure or a ‘birth machine’.
17. Participants provided examples of methods used in trafficking such as marriage and model agencies, international adoption, and escort services, mail-order brides and employment with a promise of a better paid job. The conference suggested that Member States monitor activities related to employment and study abroad, modelling business, marriage agencies, international adoption in order to ensure that an individual has an opportunity to receive objective information, make an independent choice on the basis of this information and get a job or services that he or she conscientiously agrees to. It was also proposed to verify contracts of those who want to work abroad organise pre-departure briefings in airports to inform people of the dangers of trafficking, establish specialised forensic laboratories and monitor the conduct of trials on human trafficking cases.

18. Participants noted that recruiters trap potential victims through fraud, deceit, lack of information about future jobs and employers, working conditions, accommodation, hazy promises about incredible wages. Traffickers control victims through violence or threats of violence against them or their relatives, as well as through taking possession of victims' documents.
19. Victims, especially women and girls, usually end up in prostitution dens or are forced to work in factories with no real wages or social protection. They fall prey to the actions of traffickers in search of a better life for them and their families.

Important dimensions of a coordinated and integrated response

20. Participants recognised that in order to deal with trafficking in persons, especially in women and girls, effectively there is a need for rallying political will and resources, both human and financial. The dire lack of resources to support initiatives against this scourge was acknowledged and viewed by the participants as an indication of absence of serious commitment.
21. The critical role of governments in the fight against trafficking was widely acknowledged at the conference. Their wholehearted collaboration with international organisations, civil society, including NGOs, mass media and private sector was considered as a must. The need for united and concerted action of all partners in fighting the crime of trafficking was considered to be of critical importance.
22. The participants agreed that the root causes of trafficking must be addressed. They noted that poverty, lack of opportunities, gender disparity, lack of education, inequality, violence, wars and other disasters, barriers for legal labour migration, difficulties in integration of migrants in local societies, legalised sex industry, corruption, impunity of buyers of labour and services of victims and demand for cheap labour and services are the basic causes that encourage trafficking of women and girls.
23. Some participants offered criticism of the prevailing focus of the international community on the supply side of human trafficking and the ensuing imposition of trade sanctions against some countries of origin. They maintained that, although poverty, gender discrimination makes people vulnerable to human trafficking, these factors are not the root causes or prerequisites of trafficking. It was suggested that more attention should be given to the demand side of human trafficking, prosecution of traffickers and the ensuring of equal labour rights of migrants and domestic workers through creation of employers' ethical associations, rising of public awareness in countries of destination, assistance to consumers in identifying services and products made without forced labour.

24. The conference also discussed the issue of trafficking for prostitution. Participants took up the question of effective prosecution of perpetrators of trafficking. They considered, for example, whether clients have to be prosecuted only in cases when they know that a person is trafficked for prostitution, whether it was proper to prosecute prostitutes, as well as the issue of legalisation of prostitution. Participants recognised the need to analyse which model is the most efficient. It was agreed that in any model traffickers should be prosecuted. Participants also implied that low number of convictions of perpetrators of trafficking may be explained by the lack of pronounced political will to combat human trafficking.
25. The importance of awareness-raising as well as of all-inclusive and all-engaging nature of anti-trafficking efforts was also seen as critical. The Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking and Slavery launched by the UNODC and the planned International Conference against Human Trafficking were considered an important means to intensify global anti-trafficking efforts.
26. The need for sound data and research on causes, risk factors, prevalence and forms of trafficking which could serve as a basis for developing policy responses, effective laws and support services for victims was also highlighted at the conference. Some participants noted the lack of effective and comprehensive evaluation and monitoring of implemented measures as well as a lack of resources to finance such work. The importance of exchanging information, lessons learned, best practices and the elaboration of common strategies were emphasised. Participants proposed to use Interpol tools for more efficient data-sharing between the law enforcement agencies in order to increase the efficiency of cooperation in investigating trafficking crimes.
27. The impact of corruption of public officials, especially of law enforcers, was highlighted. In a number of countries, some law enforcement officers were found to be involved in trafficking in persons or, as a result of lack of proper training in handling such cases, became complicit/tolerant of a certain modus operandi that leads to trafficking. Participants recognised the need to strengthen national criminal justice systems for effective combating of human trafficking.
28. The participants also stressed the need not to re-victimise the victims and to prevent them from suffering multiple human rights violations - firstly, when victimised by perpetrators through daily sexual, physical and mental violence which destroy human personality and make victims disabled and, secondly, when victims are treated as criminals and illegal migrants by government agents, held in detention, prosecuted and deported. Instead victims should be given the unconditional support services they need - accommodation, food, family search, counseling, health care, employment assistance, physiological help and legal advice for their eventual re-integration and rehabilitation, including protection from stigmatisation, recovery of their dignity. Participants underlined that adopting a human rights- based approach was critical to protecting victims and potential victims of trafficking. The conference also recommended that Member States make the best use of the Recommended Principles and Guidelines of OHCHR on Human Rights and Human Trafficking*.

29. Participants stated that the trafficking problem must be tackled in a coherent manner with a strategic coordinated approach. They all agreed that trafficking is an issue that requires comprehensive efforts in prevention, protection of the vulnerable and the victims, and prosecution of the traffickers. It was also noted that effective cooperation among Member States was necessary to ensure this comprehensive approach to the problem.
30. The following elements of the comprehensive approach were proposed: 1) effective prosecution of traffickers, prevention of human trafficking and protection of its victims, 2) effective cooperation between countries of destination, transit and origin, 3) clear distinction between illegal migration, smuggling and human trafficking (it was suggested that forced labour and exploitation distinguish human trafficking from two other forms of irregular migration), 4) studying and addressing complex dimensions of supply and demand sides of human trafficking, 5) double discrimination of trafficked women and girls.
31. Participants informed about the following new initiatives on combating human trafficking for sexual exploitation in the travel sector and on the internet: 1) travel agencies sign a code against human trafficking and agree to introduce policies against sexual exploitation, 2) virtual global task force consisting of relevant law enforcement departments of Australia, Canada, USA and UK acts to prevent sex offenders to use the internet for sexual abuse of children.
32. The conference's attention was drawn to the fora against human trafficking. The World Congress against Human Trafficking in 1996 was hosted by Sweden. Organised in partnership with UNICEF and ECPAT the congress was attended by more than 120 participants. In 2001 the second forum took place and it was proposed to consider holding the third forum which should focus on improving collaboration of all partners.
33. Participants proposed to establish regional training centers on combating human trafficking for law enforcement agencies.
34. The conference suggested that technical and other assistance should be provided to developing countries and countries with economies in transition in order to improve legislation, create well-trained anti-trafficking units and hold effective preventive information campaigns.
35. Participants welcomed the establishment of the inter-agency coordination group which should ensure regular exchange of information between interested international organisations. They suggested that work of the group may create a good foundation for the establishment, on a voluntary basis, of a global partnership of states, international organisations, civil society and mass media against slavery and trafficking in persons.

36. The proposal was made to begin drafting a joint UN strategy on combating human trafficking for ensuring complementary and mutually reinforcing nature of all anti-trafficking measures of the United Nations' agencies and other international organisations.
37. Participants suggested elaboration of an international convention with the definition of the status of victims of human trafficking, mechanisms of their rehabilitation, repatriation and rehabilitation.

III. Conclusions of the conference:

38. The main conclusion of the conference was the recognition of the importance of a people-centered and well coordinated approach to the problem of trafficking in human beings.
39. Synchronisation of a multitude of mandates, overlapping spheres of expertise and responsibility, while ensuring due respect for the dignity and human rights of victims, is an essential prerequisite of a successful global fight against human trafficking.
40. The Chairman summed up the event's proceedings by stating that the conference is hardly a conclusion of a dialogue on fighting human trafficking, but rather a beginning of a new stage of focused discussion, interested cooperation and effective practical action by all partners.
